Herodotus, the famous classical writer, tells an amusing story of a cryptogram invented by Hystiaus, a Grecian, who, during a visit to Persia, desired to transmit a valuable bit of information to his friend, Aristagoras, at Athens. Having a slave afflicted with sore eyes he promised to cure him by shaving his head and scarifying the scalp. When the hair had been removed Hystiæus imprinted his message upon the scalp with an indelible stain and kept the slave in close confinement until the hair grew long enough to hide the marks. Then he sent him to Attens with a message to Aristscores to shave his head against staining. Aristagoras to shave his head again, assuring the poor creature that he would then find himself perfectly cured. Aristagoras followed his friend's instructions and thus obtained the secret information transmitted by means of an ignorant messenger. It is needless to say that the slave's eyes were not materially benefited by the treatment.

An incident illustrating the case with which the cipher code is protected and the necessity for transmitting important naval intelligence in cryptogram, occurred during the recent Chilean war. On the morning of August 20, 1891, rumors became current in Valparaiso that the revolutionists had sailed down Brown was at Valparaiso with the San Francisco, and in order to verify the report he got up steam, proceeded to Quinteros bay, obup steam, proceeded to Quinteros bay, observed the landing of the congressionalists and returned with all speed to Valparaiso. On the way back he caused a cipher cablegram to be returned with all speed to Valparaiso. On the way back he caused a cipher cablegram to be prepared, advising the Secretary of the Navy prepared, advising the Secretary of the Navy will achieve quite the proper smoothness and of what he had seen. This cipher dispars flag written by Lieut, Dyer, Admiral Brown's flag written by Lieut, Dyer, Admiral Brown's flag With cuffs and collars it is much the same officer. Here is the text exactly as it was presented to Admiral Viel, the intendente of Valparaiso, for his vise in order that it might be transmitted by the cable company: "Valpabaiso, August 20, 1891.

Washington the department issued the following statement to the press:
"Admiral Brown reports the landing of 8,000 men at Quinteros bay, twenty miles north of Valparaiso. The government forces are con-centrating to oppose any advance."

This paraphrase of Admiral Brown's message as old as the most primitive system of hieroafford no clue to the meaning of the curious glyphics. Herodotus, the famous classical words of which the cryptogram is composed. In transmitting his dispatch in cipher Admiral Brown guarded against the possibility of furnishing information to the Balmacedan party in Valparaiso, for he knew that Admiral Viel would doubtless consider himself justified in taking advantage of any news that contained in reports cabled to the Navy De-partment. Lieut. Dyer, however, was not so liscreet. He was at that time corresponding for a New York newspaper, and when he presented Admiral Brown's cipher cablegram for the intendente's vise he also produced the following dispatch, written in plain English, which the Chilean admiral vised after reading it very carefully:
"Insurgents landed morning, Quinteros, eight transports, three turs, four warships. About 8,000. Government sent forces. Battle imminent. Admiral Brown saw landing. Flagship San Francisco, Baltimore, Valparaiso. Esmeralda off harbor. Quiet here."

"Did you, or any of the officers, or your crew, to any person not connected with your vessel?" Admiral Brown knew nothing of the private dispatch sent by his flag lieutenant, so he 'No one from this ship gave information."

The Secretary subsequently learned all the facts, but he decided that the information contained in Lieut. Dyer's dispatch had already reached the Chilean admiral through other channels before he vised the cablegram. The incident demonstrates clearly, however, the necessity for committing to a reliable cipher all important communications that may pass between the Navy Department and the commanders of our ships on foreign stations. THE TRANSLATION OF A CIPHER MASSAGE. The translation of a long cipher cablegram is no small task. Even in the hands of experts such errors. The work of deciphering cable-grams is generally intrusted to one or two
